

Announcing an open forum on...

What Does Marxist-Humanism Mean for Today?

Celebrating the Centenary of Raya Dunayevskaya (1910-1987)

Friday, July 2nd
6:30 p.m.

Corboy Law Center, Loyola University Chicago
25 East Pearson, Room 211
(1 block E of State, 1 block N of Chicago)

Convenor: Lauren Langman, Sociology, Loyola University

Chair: Marilyn Nissim-Sabat, author, Neither Victim nor Survivor: Thinking Toward a New Humanity

Speakers:

Peter McLaren, author, Life in Schools, UCLA

David Schweickart, author, After Capitalism, Loyola University

Sandra Rein, author, Reading Dunayevskaya: Engaging the Emergence of Marxist-Humanism, University of Alberta

Ba Karang, activist and writer for Africa-Links, West Africa

Kevin Anderson, author, Marx at the Margins, UCSB

Peter Hudis, co-editor, The Rosa Luxemburg Reader, Loyola University

*Sponsored by Loyola University Department of Sociology
and the U.S. Marxist-Humanists*

What Does Marxist-Humanism Mean for Today? Celebrating the Centenary of Raya Dunayevskaya (1910-1987)

Friday, July 2nd, 6:30 p.m.

Corboy Law Center, Loyola University Chicago
25 East Pearson, Room 211, Chicago, IL, 60611

As the global crisis of capitalism deepens, so too does the search for alternatives to it. This brings to life the contributions of Raya Dunayevskaya, an uncompromising critique of capitalism in both its “free market” and statist forms. Born in Ukraine in 1910, she was Leon Trotsky’s Russian-language secretary during his exile in Mexico. After breaking from him, she developed the analysis of the USSR as a “state-capitalist” society, published the first English translation of parts of Marx’s Economic and Philosophic Manuscripts of 1844, and from the 1950s through the 1980s developed the philosophy of Marxist-Humanism in a number of groundbreaking works. Join us for a discussion of how her ideas speak to issues now being debated by feminists, critical race theorists, and many others searching for new pathways to liberation.

Sponsored by Loyola University Department of Sociology and the U.S. Marxist-Humanists: www.usmarxisthumanists.org